SERIES: International Communist Movement materials

Administrative History: Following the dissolution of the Communist International in 1943, relationships between Communist parties were placed on a formally bilateral basis. The formation of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform) in 1947 did not alter this position for small parties like the CPGB, since they did not participate in the structures of the Cominform. Nonetheless, it was inconceivable that the CPGB would have regarded the pronouncements of the Cominform as anything other than authoritative. After 1956, the relations between the CPGB and other communist parties became genuinely bilateral. This was accentuated by the developing split between the CPSU and the CP of China, which compelled the various parties to define their positions in the controversy. The CPGB remained broadly aligned with the CPSU, although it attempted, not always successfully, to maintain a certain distance...
